Hi Steve,

I'm sorry, but I have to ask you to change my flight to Sacramento again. I thought that there wouldn't be any problem leaving on the 13th, but I ended up spending an extra week in Seattle. If they hadn't scheduled the meeting in Santa Fe for the next day, I could have left on the 23rd, but it looks now like I won't be able to fly to Sacramento until the beginning of next month. Could you book me a flight for the first? Thank you!

Because of the market downturn, our sales are postponed off the mark this quarter. We had started the year off strong, but even if the Fed increased the interest rates, our situation has worsened . Our suppliers are being upfront about their situations, which are difficult too, so we're working together to make our processes as efficient as possible. If we started this collaboration sooner, we can have maintained our sales despite the bleak picture. Nevertheless, by joining forces , we're sure to improve over the next few quarters.

The first phase of the project is finishing down . Here's where we are so far. We had a few situations in the first quarter because of the issue with the stakeholder agreement. We could have had an easier time if it not been for that problem. In any case, things have been running smoothly since the second quarter. As we finish the fourth quarter, the prediction is looking good for phase two. Our report is submitted to the investors by the end of the month. We're putting the end of the line on it now.

Let's have a check at the schedule. Mr. Tagomi was supposed to arrive in San Francisco three days ago, but Karen said he went there yesterday. If he didn't get to San Francisco before yesterday, it means he'll be here on the 12th rather than the 10th. Apparently, the Seattle meeting was postponed and it threw everything off . If the meeting happened on schedule, we wouldn't have an issue. The samples are being sent tomorrow, so they'll be here in time for Mr. Tagomi's visit. We'll need to reschedule the marketing meeting so Mary and Kevin can meet with him. We can put it off until next week.

Are you a remote worker? If you're not yet, trends suggest you may be soon. More and more companies are allowing and even encouraging their employees to work offsite, having discovered many of the advantages for both workers and employers. Though some companies are bucking the trend, far more are embracing telecommuting as the way forward.

The concept of remote working first developed during the energy crisis of the 1970s, when some people recommended having employees work from home as a gas-saving measure. Back then, the word "telecommuting" was used, referring to one's availability to connect by telephone. With the changes in technology and the proliferation of computerized devices, large companies started adopting telecommuting policies, citing both environmental and cost motives for doing so. They were also noticing that many of their employees' tasks could be done via digital means.

Remote working offers important benefits to companies and employees. Companies save money on equipment and utilities, are able to reduce the space needed for staff, and are able to recruit from a much larger pool of candidates when a physical commute is no longer an issue. Remote working has reduced sick leave and has kept new mothers in the workforce since they can effectively combine work and motherhood. Research suggests that besides feeling better about their work-life balance, remote workers are actually more productive than traditional office workers. Since they don't have to waste time in traffic every day and don't spend time socializing with colleagues over coffee, they spend more time working and report feeling less stressed.

It's not a fit for everyone, though. Top management has concerns about supervising remote workers and worries about laziness and procrastination. On the other hand, remote working sometimes results in overtime, meaning potential issues with overtime pay. However, some innovative monitoring devices are now available to help put those concerns to rest. Some remote workers have gone back to the office, saying they felt cut off from the social aspects of their jobs and found the distractions of their family, neighbors, and pets too much to overcome.

With the great variety of social media and virtual conferencing tools now available, many companies find that their staff can feel socially connected and be productive at home or wherever they are. The rise of public workspaces geared toward remote workers can be an answer for the people whose homes are just too much of a distraction. So, moving forward, we are sure to see more and more remote working arrangements.

A significant change is happening in the United States workforce because of the increasing influence of Millennials. "Millennials" are the generation of young people who came of age around 2000, though exactly when the generation started and ended is unclear. It is evident that Millennials are upending the American workplace, in no small part due to sheer numbers. They included a third of the labor force in 2015 and will represent 75% of American workers by 2030.

Although some say they are lazy, Millennials embrace work-life balance and are dedicated to their families, friends, and communities, which they serve through volunteerism. While Millennials are not the only generation interested in a balance of work and leisure, they are more willing to quit jobs they feel are not meeting their needs, spending an average of two years working for a company, compared to seven years for Baby Boomers.

Because Millennials tend to leave work they don't love, employers are needing to revamp their policies and offer new incentives to reduce their turnover. They have started offering benefits like yoga classes, massages, and highly discounted meals and free snacks, as well as opportunities for working remotely, flexible schedules, and generous vacation policies.

Companies are also overhauling their operations. Millennials search for ways to make a social difference and prefer more democratic workplaces vs. the traditional boss-employer relationships, so many companies are flattening their organizational structures accordingly and giving younger workers more responsibility and a greater say in important projects. Employers are also rethinking the concept of productivity. Millennials gauge their productivity by results rather than the hours at the office, and by this metric, in spite of their lazy reputation, are actually highly productive.

Millennials entered the workforce demanding enormous changes, and companies are adapting to this disruptive generation. Millennials are digital natives and demonstrate out-of-the box thinking, so it is in the employers' interests to keep them happy. Older workers are also profiting from the changes. In contrast to previous generations, Millennials are not fitting into the jobs offered, but rather changing the workplace to fit them.

Have you ever thought about how your office affects your productivity? Organizational and environmental psychologists make it their mission to consider this question. They've spent decades trying to discover the perfect formula for improving productivity through workplace design. Over the years, different theories have been proposed, implemented, and evaluated, only to later be replaced with the next great thing.

Offices in the 1920s were set up like traditional school classrooms, with supervisors at the front of the room and their subordinates sitting at individual desks facing them. Offices were open plan, but not in the same way they are today. Supervisors could keep an eye on everyone, and the design prevented unnecessary movement by providing clear paths down the center of the room.

The 1950s saw a shift to individual offices, but companies soon realized that this was prohibitively expensive, leading to the rise of the cubicle, a small, individual space surrounded by low, movable fabric walls. With cubicles, companies could squeeze more people into less space, and "cubicle farms" continued to dominate for several decades, eventually becoming a symbol for discontent in the workforce, particularly in the United States.

The tech boom of the late 1990s brought a new concept of office space. Theorizing that workers surrounded by their peers would be more productive, companies began adopting open plan offices where groups of workers sat together around large tables. The backlash was almost immediate. Workers complained about visual and auditory distractions, and studies have shown that this type of space can, in fact, reduce productivity as a result. Furthermore, illness spreads faster in these environments, resulting in more employees taking sick days.

Despite the negative aspects of open plan offices, many companies are still rushing to embrace them. Meanwhile, companies that have tried them and found them lacking are now moving in another direction, toward layouts with more private spaces. If history is any indication, things will surely change again.

Within the most of our lifetimes, technology has changed in one ways which most people could not have imagined. The Internet of Things (IoT) is rather a concept that might have seemed out of this world already not too long ago, but it is increasingly becoming part of many people's daily lives.

The possibilities of the IoT are just nearly limitless. As the IoT becomes a standard feature of an increasing number of devices, again a growing number of people have started to express their unease at the potential risks to which the IoT might expose them.

While a certain many amount of responsibility must be placed on many individual users to ensure that their networks are secure, it is almost indeed certainly the case that tech companies must also shoulder a burden of responsibility when it comes to what is happens to any data collected by their devices in order to deliver their services.
